ARCHITECTURE AND INTERIOR DESIGN: The Art of Collaboration

David Heide Design Studio is known for its collaborative efforts to join interior design and architecture from the start of a project. When asked to renovate a duplex in Saint Paul, Minnesota's best-preserved historic residential area, David Heide and Mark Nelson set out to create a space that respected the historical integrity of the neighborhood and provided the clients with timeless interiors, a preserved exterior, and modern technologies.

Clockwise from top: Marvin Round Top Windows, available in large sizes, are available in a variety of shapes to enhance any design and are made to order to match your individual project needs. The Marvin Ultimate Double Hung Window combines state-of-the-art window design with classic style. Marvin Ultimate Push Out Casement Windows pair expert engineering, with thoughtful design, opening like a French door without the visual center post.

David Heide, principal at David Heide Design Studio, has a background in both architecture and interior design that contributes to his ability to see the importance of interconnecting interior design and architecture. "Thinking about both concurrently helps with space planning, materials selections for construction, and even budget so that we can deliver a complete and thoughtfully composed project," said Heide in a recent interview with AD360.

This deliberate approach is evident in the Villa Renewed, winner of 2015 Marvin Architects Challenge Showdown. "We are constantly looking how window placement will affect the chair arrangement in the living room. Thinking about the project holistically is so important and cannot be overlooked," said Heide.

Mark Nelson, project architect, set out to create designs that would help him preserve the historical integrity and provide clients the juxtaposed spaces for two families with differing aesthetic preferences in the duplex—one part traditional, and the other contemporary. "Marvin offers the most historically accurate version of a contemporary window. Marvin provided new, energy-efficient windows and doors that replicated the configuration, scale, proportion, profile, and appearance of the numerous types of windows and doors found in the existing building," said Mark Nelson. In addition to replicating the appearance of the former windows, Marvin windows and doors provided a coherent and cohesive interior.

Through careful product selection and early consideration of the effect of architecture on interior design, and vice versa, David Heide Design Studio created an inspiring space that maintained the historic look and presented a modern feel.
